Faculty of Social Sciences, University of Ljubljana - The centre of knowledge and research in social sciences

The Faculty of Social Sciences is the largest interdisciplinary public institution for education and research in social sciences in Slovenia, and among the largest in Europe. In its fifty year history, the faculty has developed into a quality higher education institution with 260 staff and almost four thousand students.

The Faculty of Social Sciences builds its academic excellence through outstanding theoretical and empirical research work, extensive publishing of scientific and professional contributions, and the successful transfer of research results into the educational process and into practice. Welcome to our institution, well known for its interdisciplinary study programs, research activities and high quality teaching.

Up-to-date, relevant and interactive study programmes offer extensive, relevant, systematic, high quality and applicable knowledge about society and social phenomena. Revised, interactive and contemporary study programmes offer a broad understanding of and insight into what is happening in society, as well as a solid basis for criticism of social phenomena and influencing social change.

We offer students active engagement in modern lecture halls, involvement in research work, extra-mural activities, practice in multimedia classroom, Slovenia's largest social sciences library and publishing house. These are some of the reasons for choosing the Faculty of Social Sciences at the University of Ljubljana as your study destination.

The aim of the programme is to help students deepen their knowledge and gain understanding of global politics. The programme seeks to provide the necessary skills for actively engaging in academic and professional discussions about the contemporary international community in an interdisciplinary manner, by combining the disciplines of international politics, international law and international economics.

By the end of the programme students will have become competent experts in International Relations, capable of pursuing an academic or a practitioner career. They will have developed an ability of independent and analytical thinking about the world today in its developmental and structural dimensions, and about the functioning of international institutions and other international actors.

Studying International Relations involves a particular focus on some specific skills, such as fluency in world languages, understanding of decision-making processes and practising them, leadership and organisational skills, and communication skills. Students will have an opportunity to listen to and meet guest lecturers from renowned European universities and practitioners, and an opportunity to see and discuss international conflict management with a number of local and international stakeholders.
